Bryan Golemon spent 10 years teaching and coaching at Mannford School before stepping into the IT Director role, a fish out of water by his own description, in a world of endpoint detection and cybersecurity vendor evaluations. He's the entire technology team for the district. For years, the district's servers were protected, but all 220 endpoint devices in daily use weren't, covered by a free tool that had quietly stopped applying to a business environment. A wave of malware attacks forced the issue, and a six-month search against roughly five vendors led to ThreatDown. "I can't be cybersecurity man and tech man and everything else," Bryan told his superintendent. With no team behind him, that wasn't a real option.

ThreatDown Elite MDR now covers every endpoint with 24/7 managed detection and response, working like coworkers Bryan never had to hire. He gets a daily summary report, checks in once or twice a week, and trusts the rest is handled. Results were showing up before the trial even ended. Email Security closed a real gap: when attackers compromised a student's account and sent a mission-trip-themed phishing email to nearly 1,900 district addresses, Bryan spent four or five days cleaning it up by hand. Today, that kind of incident gets caught and quarantined before anyone notices.

Since deploying Email Security, 80 to 85% of phishing emails no longer reach employee inboxes. The one major incident in Bryan's entire time as a customer happened on the one device not running ThreatDown. He's placed three support calls total, two of them for setup help. "I'm always looking for those great partnerships that will last a while," he says. "We won't ever have to get a hold of ThreatDown, because they'll do it all for you."

> The value of the money we spend with you is value to me. What made me choose ThreatDown is [that] I don't have to do anything.
